POETRY.

They lie who tell us love has wings To fly away when press'd by sorrow, That as he flies he gaily sings: "I'll come, if the sun shines, to morrow!" For, Stella dear, dost then not know That gentle, heav nly love reposos, Upon the iron couch of woe
As sweet as in his bed of roses.

There is a spirit men call Love That owes its birth to sordid passion,
That flutters, like a moth, above
And round the gilded shrine of fashion; Thi- is he that plumes his wings And flies the field when pressed by sorre This is he that lightly sings : "I'll come, if the sun shines, to morrow

But Love that from his bower on high Poets have woo'd in spirit vision, That brings the glories of the sky Earthwards on his gentle mission,-Grows brighter as the night comes on, Sings awceter when dull woes invade us, And when dark clouds obscure the sun, His pinions closely overshade us.

Let Fortune, Summer Nymph, depart, Let hopes prove false and sorrows lower, They cannot settle round the heart Where Love has built his rosy bower; Old Time may steal from Beauty's crown The diamond Youth, that beams so splendid, But Love will smooth each wrinkle down, And sing of youth when time is ended.

Then bere's to Lov ! that closely knits True hearts with bonds that nought can sever That at the helm thro' tempests sits And guides us down life's chequered river ;-That stands u on Death's frowning steep! And flings his light across the billow-That siegs us to our cradle sleep And softly smooths ou dying pillow. Chicago, September.

THE GOOD BYE. Good bye, good bye, my very soul I wis that you would always stay-I'm sorry you are going.

He's gore, oh dear! I am so giad-I feared he would remain. He's gone, and from my heart I hope He'll never come again.

I felt so sorry when he took His leave of us that day-Not grieved indeed to see him go, But I feared he wouldn't stay.

I guess that, though we coldly met, Our parting was not chill, For I never said good bye before With half so good a will.
